

Contents

1.	Introduction	1
1.1	General description of the study	1
1.2	Brief overview of the state-of-the-art and aims of the present study	2
1.3	Organization of the study	3
2.	Theoretical background and methodology	5
2.1	Grammaticalization as a theoretical framework	5
2.2	The relation between grammaticalization and subjectification	7
2.3	Choice of corpus	9
2.4	Retrieval of progressive instances from the corpus	14
2.5	How to see grammaticalization in a corpus	17
2.6	The relation between evidence from corpora and actual language use	17
2.7	Statistical methods	18
2.8	Terminology and conventions	20
3.	The functions of the progressive in present-day English	23
3.1	The progressive as a marker of aspect	23
3.1.1	Definitions of aspect	23
3.1.1.1	The subjective nature of aspect	23
3.1.1.2	Grammatical aspect and situation type	24
3.1.1.3	More formalized approaches to aspect	27
3.1.2	General imperfective and progressive markers	30
3.1.2.1	The differences between general imperfective and progressive markers	30
3.1.2.2	Clines of grammaticalization of imperfectives and progressives	31
3.1.2.3	The English progressive today – general imperfective or progressive?	32
3.1.2.4	Specific aspectual meanings: time-frame and ‘Aktuelles Präsens’	35
3.1.3	The ‘imperfective paradox’	37
3.2	The progressive and the nature of the situation	44
3.2.1	Duration	44
3.2.1.1	The progressive and reference to duration	44
3.2.1.2	The progressive and reference to limited duration	46
3.2.2	Stativity and dynamism	49
3.2.2.1	The progressive turns statives into dynamic situations	49
3.2.2.2	The progressive turns dynamic situations into statives	52
3.2.3	Agentivity	54
3.2.4	Overt and covert situations	55
3.2.4.1	The progressive as marker of overt activity	56
3.2.4.2	The progressive and covert situations	59

3.3	The progressive as expression of speaker attitude and emotion	61
3.3.1	Subjective progressive with ALWAYS	63
3.3.2	Subjective progressive without ALWAYS	66
3.3.3	Interpretative progressive	68
3.4	A 'basic meaning' or 'core value' for the progressive?	72
4.	A brief overview of the development of the progressive before the Modern English period	77
4.1	The source of the English progressive	78
4.1.1	Which construction is the ancestor of the PDE progressive? He wæs huntiende vs. he wæs on huntung	78
4.1.2	Language-internal explanations	79
4.1.3	Language contact-based explanations	81
4.2	The progressive in Old English and Middle English	82
4.2.1	Frequency and distribution	82
4.2.2	The functions of the progressive in OE and ME	82
4.2.2.1	The progressive as marker of aspect	83
4.2.2.2	The progressive and the nature of the situation	85
4.2.2.3	The progressive as expression of speaker attitude and emotion	87
4.2.2.4	A 'basic meaning' or 'core value' for the progressive in Old and Middle English?	88
5.	Changes in frequency and the impact of external factors on the progressive in Modern English	91
5.1	General overview of the changes in frequency from c1500 to c2000	91
5.2	Distribution across genres	96
5.3	Impact of sociolinguistic variables	103
5.4	Possible reasons for the increase in frequency	106
5.5	Frequency of the type to be a-hunting	108
6.	Linguistic contexts of the Modern English progressive	113
6.1	The loss of double -ing	114
6.2	The emergence of the passive progressive	116
6.3	Variation across the verbal paradigm	121
6.4	Clause types	128
6.5	Adverbial modification	134
6.6	Subject types	142
6.7	Situation types	148
6.8	The progressive of full verbs be and have	155
6.9	Linguistic contexts of the type to be a-hunting	159
7.	The functions of the progressive in Modern English	163
7.1	The progressive as marker of aspect	164
7.1.1	General overview of the development of the aspectual function	164
7.1.2	General imperfective, progressive and derived aspectual meaning	169

7.1.3	Specific meanings of general imperfective and progressive markers	172
7.1.4	Derived aspectual meanings	179
7.1.5	A short reconsideration of the 'imperfective paradox'	187
7.2	The progressive and the nature of the situation	189
7.2.1	Duration	189
7.2.2	Stativity and dynamism	191
7.2.3	Agentivity	193
7.2.4	Overt and covert situations	199
7.3	The progressive as expression of speaker attitude and emotion	202
7.3.1	The classification of subjective progressives	204
7.3.2	Subjective progressive with ALWAYS	213
7.3.3	Subjective progressive without ALWAYS	217
7.3.4	Interpretative progressive	222
7.4	The functions of the type to be a-hunting	226
7.5	Diachronic change in the functions of the progressive	227
7.6	Distribution of functions across genres	229
8.	Evidence for grammaticalization and subjectification	237
8.1	Evidence for grammaticalization of the progressive	237
8.2	Evidence for subjectification of the progressive	243
9.	Conclusion	249
9.1	Results on the development of the English progressive	249
9.2	Results concerning methodology and general theoretical assumptions	254
9.3	Suggestions for further research	255
	References	256