

Contents

Preface	vii
1 THE 1940s	1
MacNeice and the art of the real; his dilemma in Autumn Journal ; MacNeice as a war casualty; Auden departs for New York, and rejects his political poetry; the 'new' Auden and New Year Letter ; Randall Jarrell and the end of the Audenesque; literature and society during the war, and the new Kulturbolschewismus ; Alun Lewis and the crisis of creativity during wartime; Roy Fuller and the decline of political commitment in English poetry.
2 THE 1950s	61
The 'collapse' of the poetry market after the war, and the reaction against modernism; literary intellectuals in the new prosperity; Larkin, the saddest heart in the supermarket; Donald Davie on the road to Palo Alto; a cento from the new age; Richard Wilbur and some versions of formalism (Donald Hall, Anthony Thwaite); the Movement meets its anti-type in Charles Tomlinson; Charles Tomlinson meets his anti-type in Theodore Roethke: two poets who tell us what it meant to dissent from the reigning orthodoxies; William Carlos Williams takes the measure of American life in Paterson ; but Charles Olson wasn't impressed; Allen Ginsberg opens a Pandora's Box with an elegy for the bohemia of the 1940s and a prayer for the restless spirit of his mother; three ex-formalists take us into the 1960s: W. D. Snodgrass, Robert Lowell and Sylvia Plath.
3 THE 1960s AND 1970s	167
The hegemony of the chatty-vernacular, anti-poetic, corn-porn typical poem of the 1960s and 1970s masks the stealthy emergence of the long poem as the common poetic medium of the day; a salon des refusés of untypical long poems by Charles Reznikoff, Richard Emil Braun and Basil Bunting, suggests something of the capacious heritage of Ezra Pound; an angry primitivism arrives, led by Gary Snyder; Galway Kinnell from alienation to primitivism; the loose, baggy monsters of John Berryman and Robert Lowell; the final contention between Geoffrey Hill and Ted Hughes.

Notes	217
Select Bibliography	231
Acknowledgments	240
Index	242