

Contents

List of Figures	page ix
Acknowledgements	xi
Introduction	1
1 Figuring African history, memory, and trauma	19
Memory and self	25
Trauma	31
2 Purifying the language of the tribe: (pre)colonial memory	43
Precolonial history: Elechi Amadi	49
Oral narratives and the past: Tutuola and Okara	53
Memory and healing: the archetypal case of Ayi Kwei Armah	59
Loss or lack?	71
3 Critical and traumatic realist pasts	73
Ngugi, history and memory	79
Other realisms	92
Traumatic realism and 'postmemory'	96
4 Gender, memory, history	99
Memory-work and the 'double yoke'	101
Unfixing stereotypes of African womanhood	107
'A great big void': Tsitsi Dangarembga and women's memory	112
Oppressive memories	117
'A nothingness so strong that it was a presence': the violation of colonialism in Lindsey Collen's The Rape of Sita	125
Conclusion	131

5	Imprisonment narratives: history through the eyes of hostages	133
	‘Interstices of freedom’: language and representation	137
	The self in prison	144
	The body under torture	149
	The roles of history and memory	155
	Chronotopes of incarceration	162
6	Embedding memory, seizing history: South African resistance poetry in the 1970s and 1980s	165
	Black consciousness and aesthetics	169
	Memory and history in Soweto poetry	177
	Language and memory	186
	Oral influences, ancestors and izibongo	189
	Conclusion	196
7	On shifting ground: South African fiction in the interregnum	199
	Monuments and memorials	204
	The Truth and Reconciliation Commission in literary consciousness	209
	Rewriting the Afrikaner past	217
	Writing black history	225
	Mandla Langa’s fiction of memory	231
	Getting beyond apartheid	236
8	Intimations of the postmodern	241
	Postmodernism in an African literary context	243
	History in Kojo Laing and J. M. Coetzee	248
	M. G. Vassanji’s textual pasts	255
	Conclusion: what future postmodernism?	262
	Works cited	266
	Index	285