

CONTENTS

|                                                                                                                            | Pages |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|
| Foreword                                                                                                            | ix    |
| Preface                                                                                                             | x     |
| 1. Introduction                                                                                                            | 1     |
| Part I : German Pessimism                                                                                           |       |
| 2. Schopenhauer: was India really a starting-point ?                                                                       | 33    |
| 3. Three Schopenhauerian thinkers: von Hartmann, Mainländer, and Deussen                                                   | 67    |
| (A) Eduard von Hartmann: pessimism as a post-Indian way to salvation                                                       | 67    |
| (B) Philipp Mainländer: India stabilizes                                                                                   | 77    |
| (C) Paul Deussen: a pessimistic perfection of Indian philosophy                                                            | 89    |
| 4. Spengler: the Indian parallel—fulfilment or pessimism ?                                                                 | 102   |
| 5. Gebser: the Indian complement—an arational rapprochement, or chaos ?                                                    | 126   |
| Part II : The Indian Background                                                                                     |       |
| 6. The mystical axis of Indian philosophy: as seen by a modern Western observer, in the Upaniṣads, and in the Bhagavadgītā | 157   |
| (A) A cosmopolitan description of the “ineffable”, and the hermeneutic problem of culture awareness                        | 160   |
| (B) The Upaniṣads                                                                                                          | 170   |
| (C) The Bhagavadgītā                                                                                                       | 178   |
| 7. Buddhism: existence means suffering                                                                                     | 187   |
| 8. Śāṅkara's Advaita Vedānta: ignorance and identity                                                                       | 226   |
| 9. Classical Yoga: experiential de-identification                                                                          | 245   |
| 10. German pessimism and what the Indians really meant, in retrospect                                                      | 261   |
| Bibliography                                                                                                        | 265   |
| Glossary                                                                                                            | 277   |
| Index                                                                                                               | 286   |