

Contents

INTRODUCTION	1
From ordinary consciousness to the philosophical consciousness of praxis	1
A note on terminology	1
The ordinary consciousness of praxis	2
Towards a history of the philosophical consciousness of praxis	10
Towards a full vindication of human praxis	23
Marxist polemics on praxis	30
Praxis as a central philosophical category	31
PART I: PHILOSOPHICAL SOURCES OF THE STUDY OF PRAXIS	40
Ch. I: The conception of praxis in Hegel	40
The theoretical activism of German Idealism	40
The Hegelian concept of labour before The Phenomenology of Mind	46
Human Labour in the Phenomenology	51
Practice as a practical idealism in the Science of Logic	57
Summary of the Hegelian concept of praxis	64
Ch. II: The conception of praxis in Feuerbach	70
The critique of religion	70

The relations of subject and object	72
Theoretical and religious behaviour	76
Theory and religion	78
Anthropology and religion	81
Religion and practice	82
What is praxis for Feuerbach?	84
Summary of the Feuerbachian concept of praxis	88
Ch. III: The conception of praxis in Marx	92
Theoretical and practical necessity of a philosophy of praxis	92
Philosophy and action	97
The revolution and the historical mission of the proletariat	99
Productive praxis as alienated labour	104
The transformation of man and the world	107
Man and nature: the anthropological character of natural science	111
Praxis and knowledge: the “Theses on Feuerbach”	115
Praxis as the basis for knowledge (Thesis I)	117
Praxis as a criterion of truth (Thesis II)	120
Revolutionary praxis as the unity of the change in man and the change in circumstances (Thesis III)	122
From the interpretation of the world to its transformation (Thesis XI)	125
Praxis in “The German Ideology”	127
Production in History and in social life	128
Necessity for revolutionary praxis	129
The materialist conception of history and the theory of praxis	131

The problem of the transition from theory to action	134
Marxism as a philosophy of praxis	137
PART II: SOME PHILOSOPHICAL PROBLEMS OF PRAXIS	148
Ch. IV: What is praxis	149
Activity and praxis	149
The adaptation of acts to ends	150
Practical activity	155
Forms of praxis	156
Theoretical activity	161
Philosophy and praxis	163
Ch. V: Unity of theory and practice	169
The “common sense” point of view: pragmatism	169
Practice as the foundation of theory	172
Science and production	173
Unity of theory and revolutionary praxis	178
Praxis as the end of theory	186
Praxis and the comprehension of praxis	188
Praxis as a criterion of truth	190
The relative autonomy of theory	191
Practice as subjective and objective activity	193
Ch. VI: Creative and reiterative praxis	199
Levels of praxis	199

Creative praxis	200
Revolution as creative praxis	204
Artistic creation	206
Reiterative or imitative praxis	209
Bureaucratized praxis	211
Reiterative praxis in human labour	214
Supremacy and decline of the hand	218
Imitative praxis in art	223
Ch. VII: Spontaneous and reflective praxis	228
Consciousness in the practical process	228
Practical consciousness and the consciousness of praxis	229
The new levels of praxis	230
The spontaneous and the reflective in revolutionary praxis	232
The historical mission of the proletariat in our time	234
Flashes of consciousness and class consciousness	237
From spontaneous to reflective praxis	238
The Leninist conception of socialist consciousness	239
Marxism as a philosophy of the proletariat	241
Marxism as science and ideology	243
The Intellectual and the proletariat	247
The Party as a “collective intellectual”	253
Ch. VIII: Praxis, Reason and History	259
Intentional praxis	259

Intention and result	260
Intentional praxis in art	262
Intentional praxis in social life	263
Unintentional praxis	265
Men, the subjects of history	267
Individuality and sociality	270
Unintentional products of an intentional praxis	271
Historical rationality and teleology	273
The rationality of actual history	275
The universal rationality of history	278
The universal and structural rationality of history	280
The rationality of changing social structures	283
Unintentional historical products	286
The duality of individual praxis	287
From intentional praxis to a common, intentional praxis	290
Interests and social structure	293
Limits of an intentional, collective praxis	295
Subjectivism and voluntarism in intentional, historical praxis	297
The subjective factor and objective rationality	299
Rationality and purpose in historical praxis	301
Ch. IX: Praxis and violence	305
Violence as a human attribute	305
Violence in productive and artistic praxis	306
Violence in social praxis	308

Violence and counter-violence	310
Potential violence and violence in the act	311
Revolution and violence	312
The historical necessity of violence	313
Non-violence	316
The consciousness of non-violence	318
The apologia for violence	319
Objective elements of violence	319
Men and the instruments of violence	324
Non-violent social praxis	325
The violence that negates itself	327
Towards the exclusion of violence	328
Conclusion	331
APPENDICES:
One	338
Two	352
Bibliography	371
Index	381